Tip #1181: Designing Recognition Leadership Opportunities

Overview

When students take on responsibility for recognising and celebrating their peers, they develop a deeper understanding of what positive contribution looks like and why it matters. Student-led recognition programs shift the focus from teacher-awarded achievement to peer-identified effort, which tends to capture a wider range of contributions. These programs build a school culture where students feel seen for the way they participate, not just for the results they produce, and where the act of noticing and acknowledging others is itself valued as a leadership skill.

Key Teaching Ideas

Recognition programs led by students are most productive when the criteria for acknowledgement are clear and connected to observable behaviours rather than subjective judgements. Teachers can help students identify specific actions worth recognising, such as including a peer who was standing alone, demonstrating patience when teaching a skill, or persisting through a difficult task. Building a brief nomination process into the weekly routine keeps the program active without requiring significant time, and sharing acknowledgements publicly reinforces the behaviours the school wants to see more of across the community.

Practical Application

- Effort Award Selectors: Form a small student committee responsible for identifying and presenting weekly effort awards during assembly, using agreed criteria focused on participation and attitude rather than results.
- Peer Shout-Out Board: Set up a visible board where students can post written acknowledgements of peers who demonstrated a positive contribution during physical activity or sport that week.
- Values Recognition Cards: Ask students to design and distribute values recognition cards to peers who exemplify a school value during HPE or sport, with a brief written explanation of what they observed.

© Active Education Australia 2026

- Progress Showcase Hosts: Give a student leadership group responsibility for organising a termly showcase where students share a personal improvement in movement or leadership, with peers offering positive responses.
- Gratitude Wall Managers: Rotate a small group of students to manage a gratitude wall in a shared school space, inviting the whole community to post notes acknowledging acts of kindness or contribution.

Next Steps

To build student-led recognition programs into your school, start with Anywhere PD for practical resources, or browse the Active Education Australia website for ideas on building a positive school culture through student agency.

© Active Education Australia 2026